year as June, for the vegetation busy haste preparing for the It is lush with foliage and boskage, and rife with floral invitation; so that nature is pleasing to the nd mest grateful to the sense of It is a month for the cut-of-smell. It is a month for the cut-ofdoors, a month for the early morning walk. The days are long and the mornings and the evenings are invested with that charm which the season holds sacred for such as venture to pay it reverence.

It was De Quincy who said of the early summer morning: "To me the silence of a summer morning is more touching than all other silence, because the light being broad and strong as that of noonday at other seasons of the year, it seems day at other seasons of the year, it seems roadsides all the way from Maine to sun nesota and Texus.

And then there is the rattle-box, which grows from Massachussetts to Kansas and Flerida, with its seeds contained in a box which rattle when you shake it. And there is the flouting primrose, the creeping primrose and the seaside prim-rose, all very beautiful and all bearing a fragrance which lures the bee to its duty as the fertilling agent.

There are Epilobiums also, the willow being broad and strong as that of noon-day at other seasons of the year, it seems to differ from perfect day chiefly because man is not yet abroad." But then, the birds are abroad, and the sweet and tranquil air resounds with their inspiring harmonies. It will make the day worth living to hear the morning song of the awakened hird, just as it will bless the sight to behold the awakened worth respirately because the sight to behold the awakened hird, soutspread petals to god of day, and giving him welcome in the unsung hymns of its fragrant reverence.

There is the frost weed, the Hellanthemum Canadense, which looks very much like an evening primrose with its yellow blossoms in a terminal racemes, save that the leaves are smaller, and that its flowers open when the sun snines; while the latter flowers open only in the evening. And there is another thing about the frost weed, and that is the reason for its name; for if you observe it in the fall, you will find the story filled with frost crystals in the early morning. It is not a flower whele you would notice, when you wend notice, when you would notice, when you would notice, when you see that you would notice, when you see that you would notice, when you see that you would notice, when you see that you would notice, when you would notice, which emerges and leaves the stigma or adhesive surface exposed. True to practice, the bee always begins operations at the lowest flower, and patiently works its way upward to the flower which offers nectar for its sipping. Being covered with polien, the grains adhere to the stigma, and ferlilize the flower, as the bee, intent upon probing the petals, crawls over the exposed pistil.

As the flowers of the willow-herb are rose purple, so are the flowers of several of the primroses varied from yellow, such as the showry primrose which has pink blossoms, and which grows from Missiouri to Texas, and the scapolise primross which covers much the same territory.

You will notice as you pass through some shaded road, a perfume which sugguests something hardly of earth, it is so sweet. Yet is very earthly, for it is the perfume of the grape blossoms, inconspicuous flowers, but it is the perfume which ensures us the wine which the grape may be produced in the fall. The wild grape is not as pleasing falls to accomplish for the taste. It is tropleal in its foliage, and its fruit is of the gods, for it is certainly divine.

By the waysides or in the open woods, all the way from Maine to Texas, you will note a shrubby bush of low stature, bearing clusters of diminutive white flowers. The leaves are ovate and toothed with fine teeth; and these leaves furnished the men who fought during the Revolution with many a warm draugh.

New York to North Carolina, has leaves which very much resemble those of the buttercup, to which family it belongs.

The Phlox ovata, is in flower in the woods from Pennsylvania to North Carolina. The name means flame, and is applied because of the warm color of the flowers. The leaves are opposite and sessile, that is, without footstalk, and the flowers are in cymes and are either pink or red in color. There are several varieties, one the smooth phlox, growing from Virginia to Minnesota and Florida; another, the down phlox with a downy stem, growing from New England to Florida and the wild sweet William, which is so plentiful in the south during the early summer. There is a during the early summer. There is a variety with cleft blossoms, which are of purple hue; and the moss plak which favors the sandy soil from New York to Michigan and Florida.

Of the same family is, the Polemonium of which the Great valoriants perhaps which the Greek valerian is perhap the most familiar. It is a low plant, with weak and slender branches, and with weak and slender branches, and oblong opposite leaves, and a panicle of blue flowers which are five lobed. It may be found in the woods from New York to Minnesota and Missouri. Another is Jacob's ladder, which affects the swamps from Vermont to Maryland, the leaves growing to the top of the stein and recalling a ladder by the regularity in which they are placed. The flowers are purplish, and the seeds are so gentitive that they emit threads as soon as they are moistened.

In the dry ground from Connecticut

In the dry ground from Connecticu to Florida, we may see what we take to be a morning glory bossom, a large purple flower with a striped throat, growpurple flower with a striped throat, growing upon a vine bearing ovate, cordate, that is, heart-shaped at the base, leaves. It is the Ipomoea pandurata, the wild-potate vine, which derives its name from the tuber which grows upon the root, and which fequently weighs from 10 to 20 pounds. Then, too, there is bush morningslory, which grows from Nebraska to New Mexico, the leaves being linear or narrow, and the flowers pink or purple. This plant also has a large root. Then there are the bindweeds of the same family, only that their habits are more durnal, in that they remain in flower during the entire day. They are called the Convolvulus and are very beautiful as they creep and cover the berry than the raspberry; but He never did," is a famous remark, but there is one rasberry which I'll warrant but few sliver gem of the Alleghanies, Mountain Lake, Va. one rasberry which I'll warrant but few of you know, and that is the flowering raspberry, the Rubus odoratus. If you have noticed it, you probably have noticed it, you probably have not taken it for a rose, for it very much resembles that flower, and being of the same family that is not at all surprising. It is a shrub very glandular-pubescent that is, sticky and hairy, the leaves three to five lobed, and the flowers a showy purple of five petals. The fruit is red but hardly edible. The shrub has a penchant for old residences, just as the illac bush has and the bouncing but. It grows from Maine to Michigan and

It grows from Maine to Michigan and Georgia.

In the northern woods may be found the Dallbarda ripens. It is low-lying, with orbicular crenate leaves, that is, circular and finely toothed; the flower with five white petals and many stamens; and with cleistogamous flowers, that is, flowers which are fertilized in the bud, for they never open. The plant suggests very much the violet, yet it is a member of the rose family. You may find it as far south as New Jersey, but it is a Northern flower.

find it as far south as New Jersey, but it is a Northern flower.

The queen of the prairie is now reigning in its glory of pink and fragrant flowers. It grows quite tail, from two to eight feet, and has large leaves, three to seven foliate, and somewhat resembling those of the elm. The flowers are in panicles and are very handsome. The botanical name is Spirea lobata.

In the woods from Vermont to Kansas and Mississippi, and everywhere by the wayside and in the dry soil, we may gather the agrimony. It is a tall plant, with large leaves, the leaflets being coarsely toothed, and the small yellow flowers borne in a spike. It is not very conspicuous, yet it bears a part in the harmony with which nature decorates the land.

In the bogs from Maine to Michigan and Georgia, may be found the Poterium, the burnet, a tail plant, bearing a cylindrical spike of white, club-shaped flowers. The leaves are plunatified, the leaflets being very numerous and coarsely toothed.

And of the same family, is the rose toothed.

And of the same family, is the rose, which decorates the swamps by the seasshore, the rocky soil, the banks, the woods, and even the fields with its pink and dainty beauty. And more than that, which perfumes the lanes with its inefable fragrance. The rose has excited the muse, and has led writers to poetle prose; and it grows everywhere where the weather is temperate; yea, even in the neighborhood of the Alpine snows. You all know it, and have all been entranced by its beauty, which is so sincere. There is a white rose, the Cherokee, which blossoms in Georgia and the Carollinas; but the large majority are pink.
